Education for Struggle

The one-sided class war against workers must be stopped

America's workers are under relentless attack. Today's labor movement is on the defensive. We need a renewed commitment to roll back this assault including a strategic approach to worker education and engagement. In the 1920's and the early 1930's, the U.S. working class faced similarly desperate times. Unconventional schools and training models emerged to provide "education for struggle," and soon a new generation of worker-activists were better prepared to lead the great upsurge of that period.

Today we need new forms of "education for struggle" to produce new leaders and build a new movement for social and economic justice based on solidarity between workers everywhere. The Solidarity Education Center's regional weekend Schools are designed to bring members and leaders of worker and community organizations together to explore strategies to do just that.

Discussion leaders include well-known labor educators, strategists, and social activists
